Welcome to Madison, Wisconsin, host of the MAC 2022 Annual Meeting. Our conference theme of “Moving Archives Forward” is a nod to the state’s motto “Forward,” adopted in 1851 and meant to signify Wisconsin’s continuous drive to be a national leader. This also provides a useful lens through which to examine the archival profession. What are some of the professional, environmental, societal, and cultural factors that affect the way we move forward, the way we see trends, and the way we identify challenges and opportunities? How are we leaders? The city of Madison is located on ancestral Ho-Chunk land, a place their nation has called Teejop (day-JOPE) since time immemorial. Known for its extensive parks and bike trails, organic architecture, and scenic lakes, Madison is the place to be May 5–7, 2022!

COVID PROTOCOLS
As the COVID-19 situation is continually in a state of flux, MAC will require all attendees, even those fully vaccinated, to wear masks in event spaces to provide the safest meeting experience possible. Event spaces include the Council meeting, workshops, the opening plenary, individual sessions, the business meeting, and the poster and vendor areas. This requirement is in accordance with current CDC recommendations for counties with substantial or high transmission and is in accordance with a current mandate within Dane County itself, though the mandate may change or expire (the current mandate expires March 1, 2022). Tour locations and the reception space may have their own requirements for masking, and these will be communicated to participants in advance.

We are working with the hotel to explore additional safety measures and will have sanitizer and masks available at the registration desk and in meeting rooms. We are actively monitoring the situation and will keep you apprised of any changes to the circumstances with a goal of providing a safe and enjoyable conference experience for everyone. The MAC webpage, social media, and email communications will be employed to provide updates as the conference date draws near.

For more information on the health and safety protocols currently in place at the Madison Concourse Hotel, visit its Health and Safety page.

FAMILY CAREGIVING

General Information

As an organization, MAC seeks to create a conference environment that is welcoming to all members. This includes those with caregiving responsibilities. MAC wants members to know that they are welcome to bring children to Annual Meeting events including meeting sessions, receptions, tours, attractions, and breaks. Parents are welcome to feed their children anywhere, at any time during the conference. Harassment of parents feeding their children, including requests to move or cover up, violates state law and will not be tolerated. MAC will provide designated lactation spaces as well.

If you require any assistance or accommodations while at the Annual Meeting, please contact Abbie Norderhaug or Debra Nolan with AMC Source to discuss your needs. This is an area in which MAC is trying to constantly improve. Please reach out to Vice President Michelle Sweetser with any comments, questions, or suggestions about creating a more welcoming environment for all.

CLI for GLAM: A Bash Workshop for Absolute Beginners

THURSDAY, May 5
8:00 AM–12 noon

Getting started with the command line can be tough! Many archivists never have a reason to use it... until they do, when they need to use digital archiving tools that run in the terminal. That isn't exactly a gentle introduction, and task-specific experience doesn't always translate into confidence with the command line interface. Moreover, support for those tools often assumes a level of familiarity with the command line that users simply may not have and may find difficult to acquire. That's where this workshop comes in.

Blending theory and practice, this workshop gives absolute beginners a chance to gain understanding, competence, and confidence using the command line. It will cover foundational concepts, such as what the command line interface is and how commands are structured before moving to hands-on exercises, working in Bash to develop portable, extensible skills, starting with tasks familiar from the graphical user interface (GUI). Building on those foundations, you will learn how to read error messages, use the core utilities, and build complex command statements to perform tasks the GUI doesn't support. Finally, you will have the chance to call programs and use them to read, edit, and create files, all from within the command line interface.

If the command line interface seems intimidating, arcane, or dangerously intriguing, this is the workshop for you.

Who should attend?

This workshop is for absolute beginners to the command line and those curious to know more about the fundamentals of the interface. While intermediate users or those with task-specific experience may gain some useful insights from the overview and exercise portions, experienced terminal-application users and command line veterans are unlikely to gain any benefit from this workshop.

What should you know already?

No command line experience necessary. Bring a laptop: Windows users will download GitBash, Mac users can use the native terminal.

Instructor: A. L. Carson, Iowa State University

Cost: $50

Enrollment: Limited to 20 participants

Masks Required
DEI / Intersectional Accessibility

Through real-world scenarios, you will learn how to create a more inclusive environment utilizing a variety of simple tools and skills. We will cover everything from normalizing identity markers and creating an inclusive environment, to solutions to typical, real-world situations. There will be ample time throughout the workshop for questions and group discussions, including opportunities to ask questions anonymously.

FRIDAY, May 6

Designing for Labor Equity: A Hands-On Session
Are you a manager who designs projects and positions for temporary workers? Are you a current or prospective grant reviewer wondering how to evaluate positions in projects you review? Do you struggle to understand when temporary positions are necessary, how you might best design them, and what we can do together to create a more equitable future? This session will introduce a tool for equitable position design, developed through the IMLS-funded Collective Responsibility: National Forum on Labor Practices for Grant-Funded Digital Positions. Working together, you will practice using the tool to evaluate the labor aspects of a recent, current, or planned project.

Facilitator: Sandy Rodriguez, University of Missouri–Kansas City

Solo Archivist Networking
Are you a solo archivist? Or do you work in a small shop? Do you wear many hats and juggle a multitude of responsibilities? Come to this forum to join others in a facilitated networking session. We will break off into rotating discussion groups to share challenges and successes, exchange ideas, and generate inspiration to take back to your shop.

Facilitators: Tricia Gilson, Columbus Indiana Architectural Archives
Amy Moorman, Avila University

Transforming Digital Collections: Use and Reuse
Archives have been digitizing their collections for discoverability and use for some time now. The Society of American Archivists even issued a call to scale up digitization efforts way back in 2007. As that work has become more routine, with millions of archival materials available online, and more collections born digital, how are we making the most of these assets, beyond discoverability? Join us to discuss digital archives—how we build them, describe them, preserve them, and make them available, and how digitization has or could change how they are used for teaching, research, and more.

Facilitator: Ann Hanlon, University of Wisconsin–Milwaukee

Indigenous Applications of Mukurtu for Digital Collections

Tribal libraries, archives, and museums collect, preserve, and share their unique languages and cultures while also protecting Indigenous identity, knowledge, and inherent sovereignty. Whereas many digital archives initiatives champion open access to content, Indigenous communities have cultural protocols and community preferences that necessitate more granular, deliberate management of the online circulation of cultural heritage resources.

Monique Tyndall, Stockbridge-Munsee Band of Mohicans director of cultural affairs, will discuss how Indigenous cultural heritage professionals use Mukurtu, a content management system developed by Washington State University, to privilege cultural systems of organization and to Indigenize how digital heritage materials are made accessible.

Henning Garvin, Hoocąk Waaziija Haci Language Division, will discuss the utility of Mukurtu in supporting language learning, as it enables access to natural language input for learners at all proficiency levels and creates connections to related cultural heritage.

Blaire Morseau, University of Massachusetts–Boston, will present on her prior work as archivist for the Pokagon Band of Potawatomi, where she collaboratively developed and launched her tribe’s Mukurtu site, Wiwkwébthëgen, to make linguistic and material culture collections held by the tribe and collections held around the world more accessible to the Potawatomi community.

Erin F. H. Hughes and Sarah Lundquist, WiLS, will outline the broader use of Mukurtu in preserving and sharing digital heritage in culturally relevant and ethically minded ways. They will describe the practical needs of institutions housing Indigenous collections and discuss the NEH grant Curating Indigenous Digital Collections.

Fires, Pandemics, and Silenced Voices in Archival Collections: Processing, Access, and Outreach in Times of Disaster

This panel session addresses the efforts in archives at multiple institutions to make headway on increasing access to collections at a time when our actual access to the collections was restricted. Additionally, while the world confronted racism, we interrogated our collections. Presenters will walk you through efforts at various institutions to continue the critical work of archives in response to various disastrous events. Practical guidance on developing partnerships, collaborations and workshops, reference, MPLP, and addressing silences in the archives will be offered and ample time provided for question and answers.

Presenters from Kansas State University will discuss efforts taken to respond to a fire in May 2018. The archives shifted and adapted to working in a modified classroom with limited access to collections. Through response to the disaster, presenters collaborated to develop training workshops, virtual classes, and reference workflows, and they strove to develop connections with BIPOC communities and collections on campus to better represent the student body in the institution's archives.

Presenters from Hillsdale College, Lawrence University, and Northwestern University will discuss the impact of MPLP and the COVID-19 pandemic. They developed new and unique workflows and tackled various questions about DEI and how MPLP was received by users as well as employees at their institutions.

Speakers: Lori N. Curtis, Hillsdale College (session cochair)
Ryan Leimkuehler, Kansas State University (session cochair)

Building the Plane While It’s Flying: Moving an Oral History Program Forward while Creating an Oral History Program

Cochaired by Nanci Gasiel, director of the Salvation Army Central Territory Museum (CTM), and Alexis Braun Marks, university archivist at Eastern Michigan University (EMU), this session will bring together the stories of two organizations that are creating oral history programs while learning what it means to be an oral history program that has both credibility and longevity.

Jolie Diepenhorst, CTM curator, will speak about developing an exhibit to convey the history, participation, and contribution of Black Indigenous People of Color within the Salvation Army Central Territory and the communities they serve. Realizing the archives lacked documentation, she turned to oral history and collected 23 Salvation Army officers (pastors) and their corps (local church) members across the Midwest. These oral histories have revitalized conversations about a formal oral history program at the museum.

Three panelists from EMU will share their viewpoints on the benefits and shortcomings of digital access and learning in the online environment and on how the teaching of oral history is evolving. They will consider ways to create community while moving uncomfortable conversations forward with cultural sensitivity and awareness. Matt Jones, EMU lecturer, will speak about building the EMU oral history program and instructing an oral history methods course in the midst of a pandemic. EMU graduate students Katie Delahoyde and Cheyenne Travioli will discuss their approach to oral history when you don’t see yourself reflected in the “how-to” literature and how they will be using their oral history skills in their chosen fields. With ample time left for questions and answers, the panel hopes to engage you with some of the questions you have been wrestling with around oral history.

Speakers:
- Alexis Braun Marks, Eastern Michigan University (cochair)
- Nanci Gasiel, Salvation Army Central Territory Museum (cochair)
- Katie Delahoyde, Eastern Michigan University

Power to the People: Building a Collaborative Digital Project of Indigenous Community Protest Materials

Loyola University Chicago (LUC) Libraries was approached to help the Lakota People’s Law Project (LPLP) and the Romero Institute build a public-facing digital collection using audiovisual materials documenting pipeline protest movements on Indigenous lands. For several reasons, this project was unique: there were privacy, access, and ownership questions, as the materials both depicted Indigenous communities and documented protest. Furthermore, the materials had already been used in the classroom due to a previous collaboration between LPLP and an LUC faculty member, and knowledge about successful curriculum integration presented both a benefit and a challenge to determining the project’s scope, deliverables, and timeline. Finally, the LUC project team lacked previous experience with Indigenous collections, and therefore research and education needed to be incorporated into the project timeline. The Mukurtu CMS offered a technical solution for many of these challenges: varied access levels, community collaboration, and metadata fields that support multiple perspectives and contexts. But, sustained efforts toward relationship building and project management, especially during periods of shapelessness, were critical (nontechnical) components of this digital project. This presentation will share key learnings related to planning and building an Indigenous community-oriented digital project, the use of Mukurtu CMS to accomplish and refine project goals, and considerations when working with outside (and internal) partners to manage and maintain these projects.

Two Archives Are Better than One: How Joining Forces Makes You Unstoppable

Similar collections, small budgets, and short-staffed . . . what are two solo archivists to do? Combine forces! This is the story of how two archivists recognized their collections are better together and took action. From pitching their idea, gaining institutional and stakeholder support, working together for a common goal, and bulldozing every obstacle in their way, these two archives have defied the odds. But their story doesn’t have to be unique; it can happen to you too. This session will provide step-by-step guidance for seeking out partners, building support, and combining efforts for everything from joint programs to social media to digital platforms, and even physical spaces.

Email Archiving: A Survey of Practice

Over the past few years, email preservation has become an increasingly feasible—though not yet routine or common—part of archives and digital preservation work. The email archiving community’s collaborative efforts simultaneously sustain and build the capacity to preserve email across a wider range of institutions. Introduced in 2020, the Email Archives: Building Capacity and Community (EA:BCC) regrant program is actively working to establish a baseline of email acquisition, processing, discovery, and delivery services. Overall, with support from the Andrew W. Mellon Foundation, the program seeks to build a broad community of institutions that can preserve email as part of their research collections. Still, there is a need to learn and identify the necessary reforms to plan for future areas of assessment within the email archiving community. In this lightning talk, Principal Investigator Chris Prom and Project Fellow Ruby Martinez will present the results from a survey of practice to the State of Illinois archives, libraries, and other information institutions. The survey, administered in September 2021, will a) assess the current state of adoption for email archiving within the State of Illinois, b) identify community progress and gaps, and c) explore how communities are fostering the emergence of new professional skills. In addition, the presenters will offer some initial findings from the programs awarded funding through the EA:BCC and how they can fill in existing gaps and bring the email archiving community forward.

Undergraduates in the Archives: High-Impact Practices and the Transformational Power of Primary Sources

Explore how five archives are bypassing one-shot instruction to scaffold high-impact educational practices for inquiry-based undergraduate learning in the archives. Come to this session to learn about innovative internships, class assignments, and collaborations that add value to the lives and academic success of STEM and humanities undergraduate students and contribute to undergraduate research on campus. April K. Anderson-Zorn will discuss a collaborative faculty project designed to teach health science students how to perform archival research and employ critical thinking skills to create physical and digital exhibit spaces that examine public health history topics. Sally Childs-Helton, Butler University, will present on the professional and personal transformation experienced by student researchers working with the papers of a Black Arts Movement poet for a grant to create community outreach events connecting community to collection. Brittan Nannenga from DePaul University will discuss the DePaul Documentary Corps, a collaborative internship course that builds skills in students as archival creators, donors, and workers by training them in oral history, documentary work, and archives practices. Abigail Nye and Krista Grensavitch from UW–Milwaukee will discuss how their Personal Archive Assignment engaged pedagogy to dismantle typical power structures within archives instruction and develop agency and meaning in students. Carol Street from the University of Kentucky will discuss the Learning Lab, a paid internship program where students from diverse disciplines form a learning community that transforms their academic experience from passive learners to content creators.

Forward Progress: Diverse Digital Preservation Perspectives

Unfortunately, to move digital preservation efforts forward in archives, there is no one-size-fits-all or silver bullet solution. Nevertheless, and no matter the size or type of your institution, there are practical steps that can be taken to move from no digital preservation program to an evolving one, or at least to improve upon existing efforts. To quote Trevor Owens, “Digital preservation is about making the best use of your resources to mitigate the most pressing preservation threats and risks.” This session will examine methods and tools that are transferable to all of our diverse institutions. The speakers will present case studies from their respective institutions: a solo archivist from a small, private liberal arts university will address starting an in-house digital preservation program through the use of a variety of tools and strategies, including participation in a Digital POWRR Institute. The head of Special Collections and University Archives at a midsized university will discuss how they are currently developing a digital preservation commitment levels matrix on the heels of a freshly minted digital preservation policy and digital stewardship team. The digital preservation librarian from a large university will discuss their efforts to map digital preservation and access workflows to develop process improvements, creating a prioritization and governance process for those activities, and refreshing their digital preservation policy framework. With this 90-minute session, we intend to leave plenty of time for discussion and dialogue with you about opportunities and strategies for implementation at your respective institutions.

Forgotten in the Archive: Bringing Underrepresented Groups to the Forefront

When we talk about diversity, we are referring to a swathe of lived experiences. These experiences and perspectives add to the archival record and help us more fully serve and give voice to our histories, communities, and collections. Unfortunately, many of these voices have also been long ignored by the profession. This session will detail the initiatives and conversations that the speakers have developed to insert several historically underrepresented or marginalized groups back into the story of an institution. The presenters will discuss how they are purposefully creating space for Indigenous people, individuals with disabilities, and first-generation students at institutions including the University of Wisconsin–Stout; California State University, San Marcos; and Kansas State University. Heather Stecklein will discuss her efforts to increase access to collections about individuals with disabilities by facilitating digitization internships for individuals with disabilities. Jennifer Ho will discuss her project, which strives to record and preserve the voices of professional archivists who also happen to be immigrants or come from immigrant families. Audrey Swartz and Cassie Wefald will discuss their project to rediscover Indigenous students at their institution from an archivist and a student perspective.

Moving Digital Preservation Forward: Using Assessments and Pilot Projects to Build Support

An abundance of resources, including reports, models, and case studies, exists on the topic of digital preservation. Yet, weaving together these disparate resources into a cohesive plan to establish and grow a digital preservation program can be a challenge, and gaining buy-in from administrations to prioritize and support digital preservation can be complex. In recent years, though, archivists have developed tools to assess program maturity and to identify steps to establish and improve their digital preservation programs. These tools, along with other resources, can also help archives advocate to administrators for the resources necessary for their programs. This panel will explore the utility of these tools and how they have harnessed them to grow their own digital preservation programs.

Kyna Herzinger will review the process of using DPC’s Rapid Assessment Model to evaluate the digital preservation program at her institution. She will explore how the results were harnessed to establish priorities and to advocate for modest resources aimed at growing the program.

After a brief overview of the assessment exercise Larissa Krayer conducted, she will focus on how it was used as an educational tool for library administrators and campus IT to advocate for the technical and organizational resources necessary to start a digital preservation program.

For solo archivists, time and resources are few. Joan Curbow will discuss how getting stakeholders interested in supporting digital preservation has been a major challenge, but experimenting with Preservica Starter and being able to show them what digital preservation is/can do in the form of a finished product has been a game-changer.

Partnering with Historically Excluded Communities through Oral History: Community Engagement from the Archival Perspective

This session will offer critical approaches to community engagement with underrepresented communities through two oral history projects: the Asian Alumni & Student Oral History Project at the University of Iowa and the Transgender Oral History Project of Iowa at the LGBTQ Iowa Archives and Library. Oral historians Jin Chang and Aiden Bettine, from an institutional archives and a community archives respectively, will discuss how both projects prioritize narrator autonomy. Through reflexive, identity-based praxis, the presenters will share their perspectives on archiving their community’s own history in the Midwest. Jin Chang began the Asian Alumni & Student Oral History Project in response to the murder of Asian women in Atlanta in April of 2021 and in recognition that Asian student life was largely absent from the University Archives. Capturing the experiences of Asian Iowans also challenges the traditional view of Asian American studies that privilege the experience of the coasts. In short, these oral histories capture a unique type of racialization that occurs in the Midwest. Aiden Bettine founded the Transgender Oral History Project of Iowa and the LGBTQ Iowa Archives and Library with the goal of enabling queer and trans people to preserve and share their own history. This work offers a disruption to existing queer history that privileges urban centers such as New York or San Francisco. This work preserves queer history that is uniquely Iowan and midwestern in nature. Guided by a shared ethos centered on community control and participation, this session will offer reflections on ethical community engagement from an archival context, regardless of organizational size and resources.

Through the Looking Glass: Archivists as Researchers

As professional archivists, we are dedicated to facilitating and supporting research in our collections. For those of us who’ve worked reference, we know what to do to help researchers, but what transformations happen when we become researchers ourselves? How does our professional training inform our research approaches in other collections? And, how do our research experiences then affect our practice? When Sasha Griffin began a personal, international research project to find more information about her adoption, she realized that the topic of archivists as archives researchers and users is rarely addressed in our profession. Join Griffin for a talk-show-style session featuring archivists Dara Baker, Sarah R. Demb, and Deirdre Scaggs discussing the intersection between being archival stewards and being archives users. Dara Baker (NARA and Salve Regina University) used archives as a researcher before becoming an archivist and now, after a decade as an archivist, is utilizing archives for her PhD dissertation. Sarah Demb (Harvard University Archives) will discuss her research experience with and professional response to an unprocessed collection. Deirdre Scaggs (University of Kentucky) will explore the advantages in being an archivist while researching manuscript collections for her cookbook The Historic Kentucky Kitchen: Traditional Recipes for Today’s Cook.

New Leadership Models at Four Big Ten Special Collections Libraries

This panel presents new leadership models and approaches from four special collections units within the Big Ten Academic Alliance. These approaches to leadership are informed by—and seek to embody—guiding values or principles articulated by these four libraries, which vary but include among them care, collaboration, empowerment, creativity, and inclusivity. At each library, these new models are applied to change the way the organizations approach (for instance) collection development and stewardship, the development of missions and strategic directions, improvements to workplace climate and culture, and learning and goal-setting related to systemic racism, among other topics. Each of the four panelists will discuss a different model or approach with specific examples from their institution and share some thoughts about how their model or approach could be applied at other institutions.

Digitization for Engagement in the Pandemic and Beyond

In this roundtable discussion, speakers will share their experiences at small to midsized institutions initiating digitization efforts to engage users during the pandemic and beyond. All three institutions found both rewards and challenges in their digitization efforts.

The pandemic encouraged the University of Northern Iowa (UNI) Special Collections & University Archives to intensify digitization efforts to increase online discoverability and accessibility. Speakers will focus on two efforts: an online primary source literacy guide designed to support instruction and access to collections in a remote environment and a “Collection Highlights” website feature where student employees select and showcase digitized content to give users a glimpse behind the scenes.

In 2021, the Norwegian-American Historical Association (NAHA) tackled its first major grant-funded project to digitize the O. E. Rølvaag papers. During this project, staff realized the importance of finding new ways to engage members, students, and staff at St. Olaf College and the larger international community. We developed initiatives to include undergraduate and graduate students, created pop-up and digital exhibits, and developed “Inside the Archives” events.

The University of Nebraska at Kearney (UNK) Archives & Special Collections developed two digitization streams, one for community-initiated projects and one for archives-initiated efforts. We will look at one example of each. UNK made available the Country School Legacy oral histories, which were used in a Nebraska History blog post assignment. The archives also strengthened ties with a local organization by digitizing and hosting the contents of its 1920s time capsule.

DIGITAL Readiness and Access Transformation

Digital readiness and community involvement require new tools, new ways to collect and interact, and reparative language and skills that build new centers of practice. Join four digital projects practitioners to learn about access in varied cultural heritage environments. Accessible language, accessible memory worker training, accessible viewing of digital materials: who has access to the archives? To embody access within the space of the institutional archives is to confront and actively resist the values of white supremacy. Preserving and reprioritizing the collection of marginalized narratives creates avenues of access to the archives.

Hear from a local history solo archivist, a public librarian, a historical society archivist, and a digital readiness educator what “access” means in these contexts. Elizabeth Morris of Bensenville Community Public Library, Stevie Gunter of Denver Public Library, Nancy Webster of the Highland Park (IL) Historical Society, and Kristen Whitson of WiLS/Recollection Wisconsin will each share their own experiences with increasing access to archives through grants, training, embracing new digital tools and applications, and reparative processing and language. Our responsibility as memory workers is to listen to the voices of marginalized communities to facilitate access to their own community and cultural heritage. Only by constant practice of new language found through interaction with those communities will we overcome our own biases and assumptions.

You will learn about documenting historically underrepresented or marginalized groups and how community relationships impact every aspect of archival work, from metadata to outreach to practitioner training to organizational principles.

Documenting and Learning from Our History: Archives as Sites of Social Change

The COVID-19 pandemic and the uprising of 2020 revealed deep fissures in the way our society understands and thinks about its history. These historical understandings and misunderstandings are not separate from our colleges and universities. Our campus histories are deeply ingrained in how we understand our universities and ourselves as members of these communities. Yet, the histories of marginalized communities are often underrecognized and obscured in favor of “color blind” institutional narratives. The University of Wisconsin–Madison Archives and the University of Wisconsin–Madison Public History Project are both working to expand the university’s understanding of its history with a focus on centering underrepresented communities. This panel discussion will detail these efforts, including the Archives Student Historian, a role designed to empower students of color to document their communities’ history, and the Public History Project, a multiyear effort to uncover histories of discrimination and resistance on campus. Panelists will reflect on the impact and challenges of this work.

Archives and Art: Connections and New Directions

This roundtable will explore the intersections of archives and art from a variety of standpoints rooted in archival studies. The roundtable participants, all junior scholars, each approach these questions from a different angle—one will explore the connections between artists and the formation of community, grassroots, and nontraditional archives. Another will examine the role of storytelling and memory work practices within contemporary art spaces such as galleries and arts organizations. A third will read art activism practices alongside archival theories. Drawing from experience across these sites of investigation, roundtable participants will consider a range of current partnerships between archivists and artists while discussing several key questions: to what extent do conversations in archivy and art converge and diverge? What opportunities for future collaboration exist between artists, archivists, and their respective institutions? What can archival studies learn from art-oriented memory work? What can archivists bring to art-focused spaces? The roundtable will present an interdisciplinary approach for you to think together about the ways in which deepened engagement with the arts can move archives forward.
